Although craniopharyngioma is a very common paediatric intracranial mass, it is often not considered in the list of differential diagnoses of children presenting with symptoms of visual disturbance or endocrine dysfunction. Because of the variability of presentation, craniopharyngiomas are not always diagnosed in the paediatric age group at presentation. We report on a retrospective review of the clinical data and imaging studies of all craniopharyngioma cases diagnosed at our institution over a 13-year period. We identified 15 cases. Six of these cases had undergone external radiotherapy, and 5 had required stereotactic radiotherapy. The mean time of presentation to our institution was 21 months (range 6 days-17.6 years). Only 1 patient presented with a clinical diagnosis of craniopharyngioma. Immediate and unexpected visual decline was the most frequent presenting feature (67% of cases). Visual disturbance preceded headache in most cases (86%), visual loss was progressive in 7 of 10 cases, and visual loss was partial in 6 of 10 cases. The most common visual features were "double vision" and "field loss" as the patient moved their eyes from side to side. A visual field deficit was noted in all patients. A negative visual acuity test was found in 5 of 14 patients, while 7 of 14 patients had normal visual acuity testing. Adolescents were more likely to have delayed visual loss ( $p = 0.0075$ ). Visual loss caused by craniopharyngioma, which is often progressive, can have a delayed presentation in children. It can thus be misdiagnosed as the first presentation of other visual symptoms.Q: Overriding an Object by its Superclass Without losing generic Type I have: public abstract class A, R extends A> { public T getSelf() { return self(); } public R getSelf() { return self(); } public abstract R superSelf(); } in my super
